

IT ALL ADDS UP

This year, COVID-19 made it clear to us all that health is vital to nearly every aspect of our lives. And looking ahead, the challenges and complexities of health only get steeper from here -- with a growing burden of diseases and increasing gaps for health systems and broader society to address over the next decade.

It's clear that "business as usual" won't get it done. The world needs new approaches to health.

To help create a healthier future, Abbott is on a mission. We're setting out to reach more than a billion more people than we do today -- improving the lives of one in three people on the planet every year by 2030. This is the central goal of our 2030 Sustainability Plan.

To get there, our plan has a clear priority: designing access and affordability into our life-changing technologies and products to reach more people, in more places than ever before. And beyond this central focus, our plan has a range of targets across other sustainability areas as well.

You'll find a brief overview of our plan below, along with links to our 2030 targets, stories illustrating our work, and an update from the Dow Jones Sustainability Index (DJSI) on our leading sustainability performance.

A SUSTAINABLE FUTURE STARTS WITH HEALTH: ABBOTT'S 2030 SUSTAINABILITY PLAN

A sustainable future starts with health. It's the foundation for all that we can do in life - as individuals, families and communities. It helps societies thrive and fuels successful economies.

That's why health is at the core of our purpose, and our 2030 Sustainability Plan. We are focusing our efforts where Abbott can have the greatest impact: making access and affordability core to new product innovation. To bring this to life by 2030, we developed a 10-year business plan to build a stronger, more sustainable Abbott that better serves the many people who depend on us.
